G. O. P. RALLY

The marked effect of our type of government upon wages is astonishing. The American thought has always been that if the people are to govern, they should individually be intelligent as well as moral.

Under our system of public schools, town meetings, frequent elections and universal suffrage, the ancient blight of serfdom has been destroyed, the dignity of labor has been recognized, and a reasonable reward has been accordeded to every form of indus-

The extent to which this has been done is astonishingly revealed in a recent report of the British Board of Trade who investigated the subject in every country of continental Europe, as well as in the United States, and whose report shows that wages in the United States are, as a whole, two and one-half times greater than in Great Britain; two and threefourths times greater than in Germany and more than three times greater than in France or Belgium.

In the attitude of the republican and democratic party toward labor, the reward for which is so much greater in the United States than in Europe, differs radically in character, and the question whether the American working man shall be protected in his birthright or whether he shah be compelled to relinquish it and compete directly with his less fortuproaching election.

For more than a half century, this government has, with the exception of a single term, been administered under the principles adopted by the eral movement by duties on imports, they should be so adjusted as to develop the industrial interests of the whole country, to secure to the working man liberal wages, to agriculture remunerative prices; to manufacturers and mechanics an adequate reward for their skill, labor and enterprise and to the nation commercial prosperity and independence.

On the other hand, the democratic party has, from the beginning, advocated the principle of a tariff for revenue only, and has before the war and ever since, and especially in their been giving the consumer some conenue."
